Three looks for a city-building permit game

Concept, not the finished game.

Look A

Look B

Look C

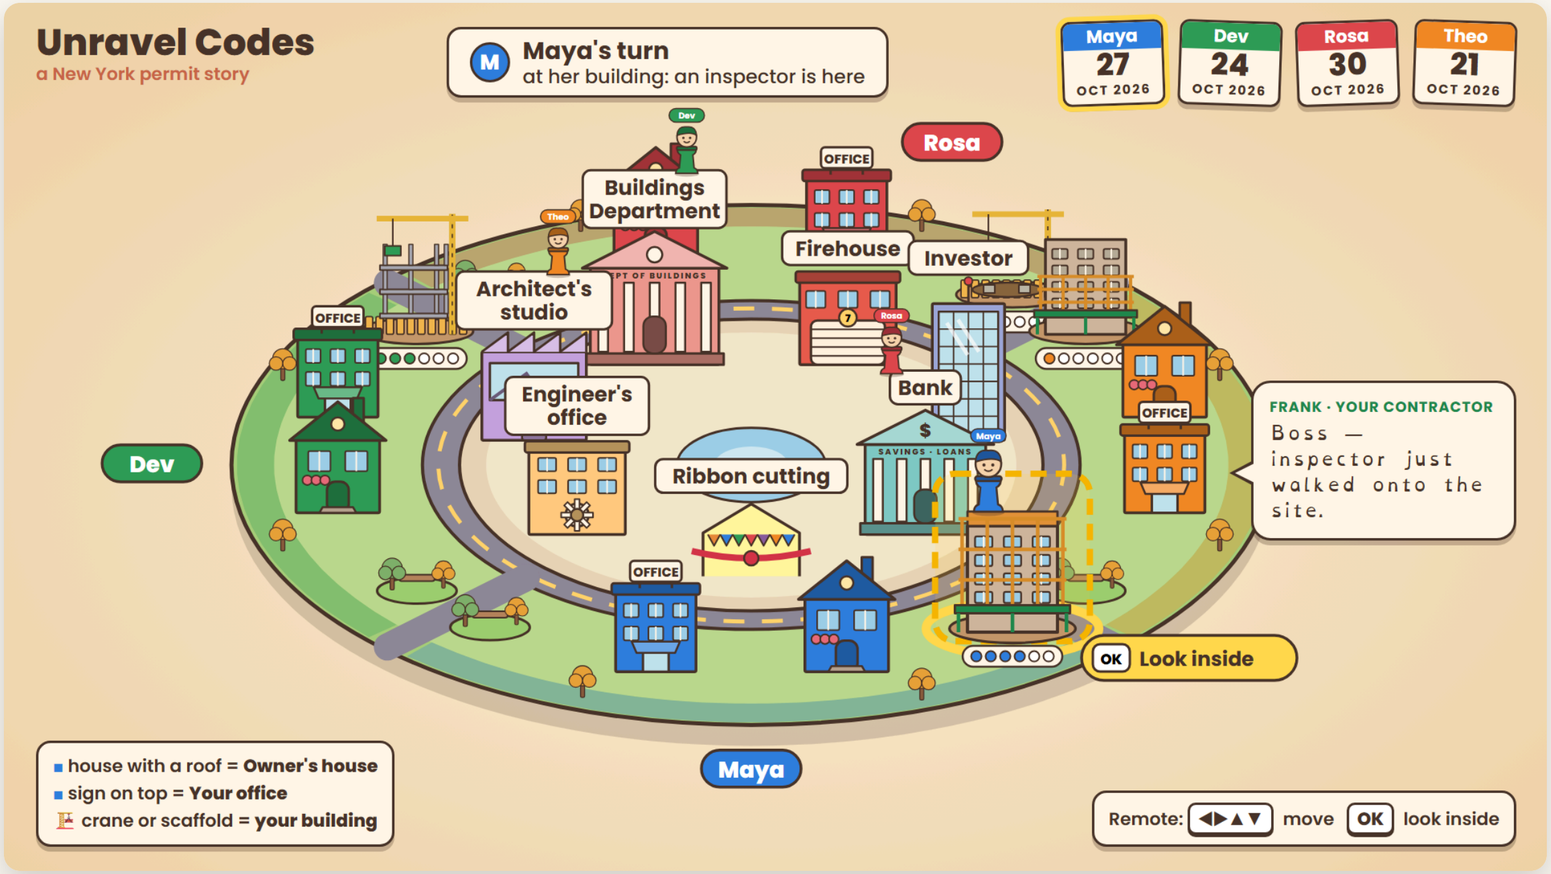

A board game about getting a building approved and built in New York City. Everyone plays on their phone; the town shows on a TV. Same moment in all three looks: Maya's building is half built and an inspector just walked in.

Which look would you most want to play? What would you change?

Look A

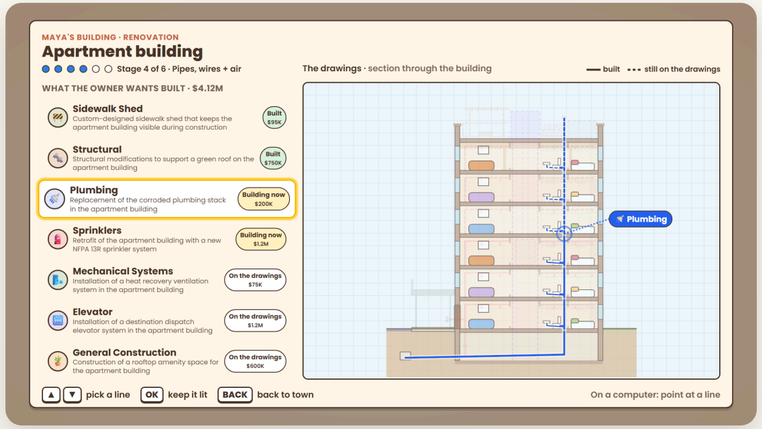

Buildings stand up like a pop-up book on a round map. Each one has its own shape, so you can tell them apart at a glance.

THE TOWN ON THE TV

YOUR BUILDING IS GROWING: THE DOTS UNDER EACH SITE SHOW THE STAGE, 1 TO 6.

LOOK INSIDE: POINT AT A LINE, THAT PART LIGHTS UP

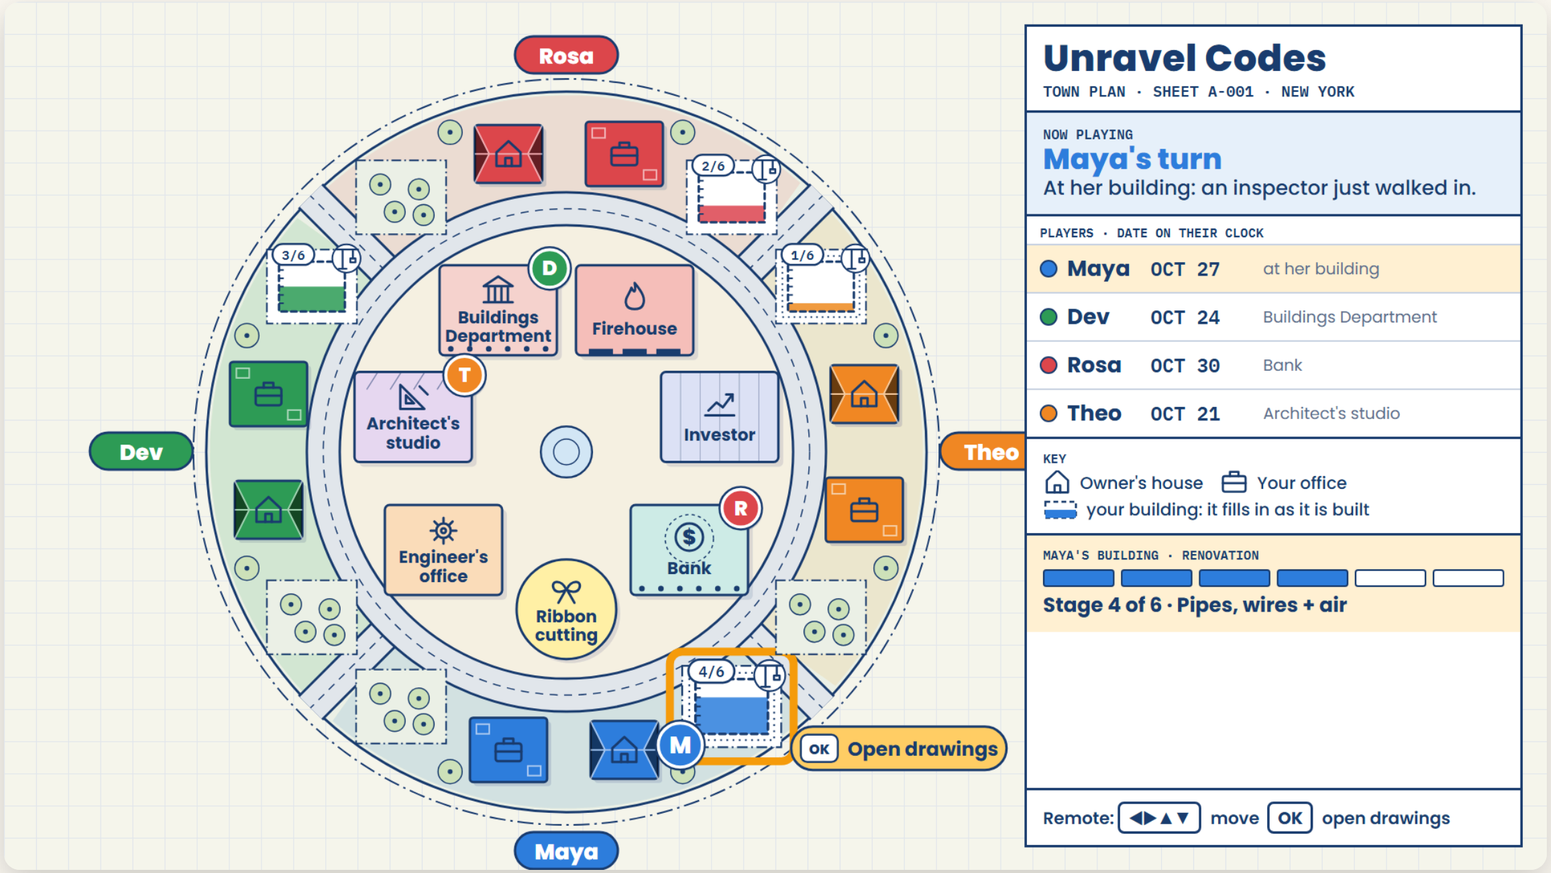

THE PHONE

The contractor talks in a speech bubble with his face; the story line sits in a yellow box, like a comic. Your money, time and scope stay on top.

Look B

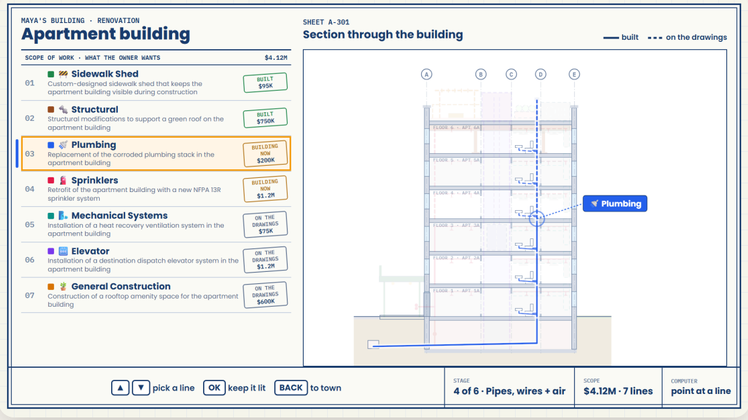

The town seen from straight above, drawn like a light, simple architect's sheet. Your building fills in with colour as it gets built.

THE PHONE

The contractor's words come in like text messages; the story is a small grey line. Your money, time and scope stay on top.

Concept, not the finished game.

Look C

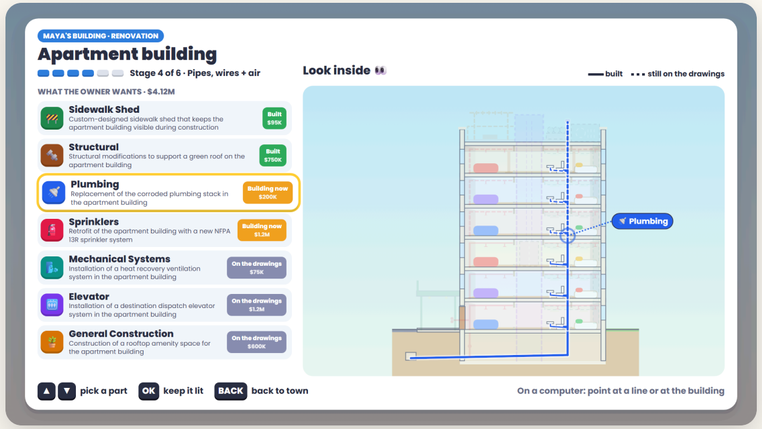

A paper model of the town on a round table: bright and bouncy, but flat colours like a real architect's model.

Like a story game: the contractor stands at your building, and his words sit in a talk box with his name tag. Your money, time and scope stay on top.

POPPINS

Boss, inspector just walked onto the site. We fix it before they see it, or I steer them somewhere else. Your call.

- Studies so far find that special dyslexia fonts do not make reading faster or more accurate, but they do no harm, and some readers like them.
- So the idea is a choice: an "Aa" button on each phone, so every player picks the font that is comfortable for them.
- Poppins stays for titles, names and numbers.
